

Tequila Glossary

Agave

What tequila is made from. It's not a cactus but a member of the lily family and only blue agave may be used for tequila and all of our tequilas are made from 100% blue agave unless otherwise indicated.

Añejos

At a minimum añejos get 1 year of aging in wood and some receive more than 5 years. This treatment results in a flavor profile comparable with fine scotch and cognac.

Blancos

Are also known as white, silver or plata, blancos are aged a maximum of 30 days and offer the best pure expression of blue agave flavor.

Joven Abocado

This is blanco tequila with caramel coloring added to give it an aged appearance and create the ubiquitous gold tequila sold all over the world but rarely seen in Mexico.

Licores

Sweet, tequila based liqueurs, infused with various special flavors.

Highland Tequila

These tequilas from the highlands northeast of Guadalajara and tend to have a "fruity" character.

Lowland Tequila

Tequilas from this area southwest of Guadalajara, surrounding the town of Tequila, generally have more wood and earth flavors than Los Altos products.

Mezcal

All tequila is mezcal, just as all cognac is brandy: Tequila and its surroundings are actually a place where famous mezcals are made. Most top quality mezcals come from the area around Oaxaca in southern Mexico.

Mixtos

These tequilas are made from 51% blue agave and okay for a margarita or a traditional salt-shot-lime routine but the quality of this style of tequila is certainly inferior to those made with 100% agave.

Reposados

These smooth, golden hued tequilas are aged in wood for 2–12 months and are excellent for sipping.

Super Añejos

These special añejos are wood-aged a minimum of 3 years. The prolonged ageing slowly transforms a tequila añejo into a drink they say is 'dressed in tails.'

Tequila

Tequila is produced mostly in the western Mexican state of Jalisco. There are two key areas, the lowlands, close to the town of Tequila, 56 km to the west of the city of Guadalajara and Los Altos, or the highlands around the same distance to the northeast.
